PREFACE.

This bibliography is a preliminary investigation looking towards bringing together here at the University of California as complete a collection of works regarding Bishop Berkeley as can be procured. Such a collection would be a most fitting memorial of him, in whose honor our city is named.

So few of the books listed being available for examination, full bibliographical data can not be given in every instance. The work was begun some three years ago at the suggestion of Librarian J. C. Rowell, to whom many thanks are due for helpful advice, and has been carried on at intervals as time permitted. The semi-centennial of the founding of the College of California, and the two hundred and twenty-fifth anniversary of Bishop Berkeley, seems a fitting time for its publication.

H. R. M.

BERKELEY, Cal., March 12, 1910.

A SKETCH OF BISHOP BERKELEY.

George Berkeley was born at Dysert, Kilkenny County, Ireland, March 12, 1685 n. s. He was of Anglo-Irish descent; about his parents little is known, but as a boy young Berkeley was unusually precocious. In March, 1700, at the age of fifteen, he matriculated at Trinity College, Dublin, graduated four years later, and in 1707 took his Master's degree.

In that year he published his first work, two mathematical tracts in Latin. In 1709 he received his first ordination. Four years later, after a stay of thirteen years, Berkeley left Trinity College to accompany Lord Peterborough, as chaplain, to Sicily. In the meantime he had written and published, An essay towards a new theory of vision, 1709; A treatise concerning the principles of human knowledge, 1710; and Three dialogues between Hylas and Philonous, 1713. After a short stay on the continent Berkeley returned to London where he remained two years. In 1715 he went to Italy as a traveling tutor and visited various countries of Europe before he returned to London in 1720.

In 1724 Berkeley received from the Duke of Grafton the rich preferment of the Deanery of Derry. Meanwhile he had at heart a gigantic philanthropic scheme for civilizing and christianizing the American Indians by establishing a college in the Bermuda islands. He published A proposal for the better supplying of churches in our foreign plantations in 1725, and the following year he was in London seeking funds for the furtherance of his plan.

He married Anne Forster in 1728 and set sail for Rhode Island, as he deemed his actual presence in America a preliminary necessity to establishing a college there. He landed at Newport in January 1729, bought a farm, and there passed nearly three years in studious retirement. When he learned that the promise of an endowment of $100,000 for his college would not be fulfilled by the English government, he returned with his family to London in February, 1732. Although Berkeley's primary scheme to found a college failed, still his presence in America bore fruit; Kings College of New York (now Columbia University) was formed closely on a model furnished by him to the first trustees; Yale benefited from many gifts; and here, at our Golden Gate, the seat of the University of California is named in his honor.

Berkeley brought with him to London the manuscript of Alciphron, or the minute philosopher, published in 1732; his Theory of vision, vindicated and explained, followed the next year; and the Analyst in 1734. This ends what is sometimes called the American period of his life and the second of his authorship.

In 1734 Berkeley returned to Ireland, as Bishop of Cloyne, where he remained for eighteen years. The misfortunes of Ireland led to the publication of the Querist, in 1735 to 1737, which contained sound political economy that anticipated David Hume and Adam Smith. He opened a distillery for the concoction of tar-water, whose invigorating and curative properties he had learned from the Narragansett Indians in America, and in 1744 published Siris: a chain of philosophical reflections and inquiries concerning the virtues of tar-water.

Berkeley left Cloyne in 1752 to take up his residence at Oxford, where his son George had entered Christ College; the same year he published his Miscellany, a reprint of various tracts. Berkeley died very suddenly at Oxford, January 14, 1753, and was buried in the cathedral of Christ College.

In general, although Berkeley is not ranked in the first class of metaphysical thinkers, still his thought forms the basis of most of the great conflicts of speculative philosophy of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. His theory of idealism he gradually brought out in his writings; he first took up vision, demonstrating that our so-called visual perception of things at a distance is an illusion. He next discusses matter, working out his doctrine that external things do not exist, but that all reality is spiritual, i.e., the manifested ideas of God. The special use Berkeley made of his theory was to refute deists or free-thinkers, and to defend Christianity.

His philosophy was seriously considered by but few of his contemporaries and he suffered from the almost total absence of intelligent criticism. Not until the middle of the nineteenth century did he receive sympathetic notice in England. Just a century earlier, the starting point of French criticism began with Voltaire and Condillac, but it was the latter part of the nineteenth century before Berkeley received serious consideration in Germany. Philosophy is indebted much to the subtlety of his genius and the originality of his speculations.

As a writer, Berkeley's merits are of the highest order. He was a complete master of literary form. Gosse says, "He is one of the most exquisite of all writers of English prose," and Saintsbury calls him, "The greatest master of English philosophical style." He was a close friend of the leading English men of letters,—Addison, Pope, Steele, and Swift, being especially under the patronage of the latter.

Berkeley was a man of medium stature, erect and handsome; great learning, large conversational abilities, amiable manners, and liberal sympathies gave him an individuality and a charm that is rarely surpassed.

7. PORTRAITS.

Arranged under the name of the painter, or engraver when possible.

For many of the references I am indebted to the A. L. A. Portrait Index.

Fraser mentioned eight different portraits in England and Ireland. Three at Trinity College, Dublin, and one owned by Robert Berkeley of Dublin. The four in England are the one owned by Rev. Irons, painted by Smybert in 1725, one owned by Rev. Sackville Berkeley, the one at Lambeth, and the one owned by Sir David Brewster, said to be by Vanderbank. There are at least three Smybert paintings in America.

[Photographs of the portraits of Bishop Berkeley; an ivy leaf from the Bishop's garden; and several autograph letters concerning Berkeley.] sm. F. (U).

Five photographs.

Portraits, unassigned to any particular painter.
